

2015 Building Research Capacity with Indigenous Communities Workshop

“Research by and for Indigenous peoples is a ceremony that brings relationships together”

– Shawn Wilson, Research is Ceremony: Indigenous Research Methods
Fernwood Press, 2008

Building Research Capacity with Indigenous Communities aims to bring First Nations and other Aboriginal peoples, university-based researchers and students, policy-makers and others wishing to learn more about undertaking research and scholarship in a way that builds relationships between Indigenous communities and researchers together at St. Mary's First Nation. Participants in the workshop will discuss research collaborations that build positive relationships out of a commitment to mutual respect and understanding. The workshop will include presentations on the perspectives of Indigenous community members, researchers, and students on collaborative research with Indigenous communities as well as a talking circle in which all participants can share their thoughts on conducting research by, for, and with Indigenous communities. It is an opportunity for participants to establish relationships and learn more about the intricacies and ethics of undertaking research with Indigenous communities.

Tuesday March 17th, 2015, 8:30 am—3:30 pm

45 Dedam St., St. Mary's First Nation Cultural Centre, New Brunswick

This workshop is sponsored by The Atlantic Aboriginal Economic Development Integrated Research Program (AAEDIRP) and developed in partnership with The Mi'kmaq-Wolostóqiyik Centre (UNB) and the Faculty of Education (UNB).
